Come hail and high water …

It wasn't quite raining cats and dogs, but monster hailstones shaped like everything from cauliflowers to poached eggs and jellyfish battered the NSW coast on Thursday night, leaving many Sydneysiders puzzled over how such varied hail shapes are formed. Rose Barr, a duty forecaster with the Bureau of Meteorology, said the hailstones' shape and size was determined by the path they took through the storm. "How much they weigh and how they look when they fall from the sky reflects where the hail was in the updraft, when it was there and how long it spent in negative temperatures," Ms Barr said.
